LIEUT. RICHARD ALDWORTH.

By the Associated Press.

Mac to be the biggest pitching find of the year 1915, has fisted in a Buche machine in the fighting with the American army in the Verdun sector. An announcement of the success of Lieutenant Aldworth is contained in an Associated Press dispatch from the American headquarters dated Nov. 7, which was received by the Right Tuesday. The dispatch says:

"An American aerial patrol yesterday encountered several German machines in the region northwest of Verdun. There were two brief battles, in which Lieutenant Richard Aldworth of the San Antonio, Texas, and Lieut. Howard Smith of Hudson Falls, N. Y., each brought down an enemy airplane. The rest of the German machines made their escape."

Lieutenant Aldworth, who is only 20 years old, is stationed at 101 Fourth Street, South San Antonio. He has been in France for 14 months, having been sent overseas from the officers ground school at Ameurville, and has been flying single-engine planes, with which he shot down an enemy plane in what was to his mother is the great."

In opposition to certain destructive tendencies, there are many brave men in the ranks who look askance with the idea of a firmer defense. The Koelnische Volks-Zeitung reports that the city officials are aware of the situation and are considering the matter. The Rheinische Westfalen-Zeitung says:

"The spirit of war is spreading. The men who are being trained for the war are not only the soldiers but also the workers. They are being taught how to use the guns and how to handle the machines."

With the Buzza, the spirit of war is spreading. There is a scene of panic in the war fever. Today, the American troops are facing the enemy lines of truth."
